Overview

Communication in this age of globalisation plays a complex, increasingly multilingual, multilingual and an ever important role in today's society. Under such circumstances, Multinational companies and institutions require their translators to be familiar with specialized training. The rising need for translation generally is marked by a particular surge in demand for skills in translating specialist audiovisual texts.

The rationale of this module is to meet the need at national and international level for language specialists in subtitling, especially in Indian languages, who should possess the linguistic competence and necessary expertise for operating successfully in the professional environment.

The aims of this module are to develop subtitling skills in a variety of registers and styles, by translating texts from various Indian and/or foreign languages and programmes of an audiovisual nature. It aims to produce individuals capable of operating professionally and reflectively in this rapidly developing translation environment.

Through a range of carefully chosen examples and exercises, participants will not only develop confidence and subtitling skills, but also broaden their awareness of the idiomatic and syntactic features of the language as well as their knowledge and perception of socio-cultural referents. Participants will be able to work with subtitling freeware so that they can learn how the technical and technological dimensions of subtitling influence the final written result. An insight into the working environment will also be presented.

Further, this module will expose the participants to the fascinating professional practice of making audiovisual material accessible to people with visual impairment. It will help the participants to develop audio description (AD) skills in a variety of registers and styles by translating visual texts into words and broaden awareness about the special needs of AD with reference to grammatical and syntactic structures of language.
